

Saving Cars And Cash

(NAPS)—The average car on the road today is 11 years old, auto-makers report. If yours is among them, here's good news: You can pocket serious savings on repairs with high-quality used parts.

Here's how it works: You go online to www.pullapart.com to find the price of the part you need and see whether it's in stock at the nearest location. If it's not, you can see which other vehicles have the same part and whether they're in stock.

Smart do-it-yourselfers can find high-quality used car parts at 30 to 90 percent savings over the cost of new ones.

At the Pull-A-Part superstore, you'll see vehicles on stands, arranged in rows, organized by manufacturer. The staff or the store computer can tell you where to find the part you want. The supply turns over daily, so if you can't find the part you need today, you can sign up to be notified when it's available.

As a bonus, you can be green while saving some green. When you buy a used car part, you're keeping it in circulation instead of sending something perfectly useful to a landfill.
